More about the partnership photo: The perfect school shutterstocking for your kids is such a big decision. From that first kindergarten class until they leave for college, we want them in an environment that is sound with academically high-quality teachers. One that offers opportunities to participate in clubs, sports and other activities. One that is diverse, safe, has good facilities and prepares them for college or post-college life. It's a lot to find out, though, especially if you're moving to a new area or on the road that other high school would like to compare this particular high school against. Or if your high-schooler is trying to narrow down his college choices. But I came across this week a site that seems to have done a lot of work for us: Niche.com. You can use niche to compare K-12 schools and colleges, which makes it uniquely valuable to both parents and high school students. You can search for the best schools and districts by state, city, public and private — or by the best teachers, best college prep and the most vibrant student life. You can search for the best colleges in any number of categories: liberal arts colleges, community colleges, private universities and best value, to name a few. Or you could search for top schools by major, by state, or by academics. Those acceptance letters (hopefully) are rolling in, and it's just about time to make the final.. I Read more the site was surprisingly useful in a discussion my husband and I have been having since our son started in his K-5 school: Where do we want him to go to middle school and high school? Your elementary school would feed into three of our district's middle schools, so your friends would likely spill out. And since we're probably looking to move around the time he's approaching middle school, we move based on school boundaries to determine where he goes, if we decide we prefer one school over another. All of the schools are quite comparable, but niche provided information in their analysis that can really help us sway in one direction. It's including the U.S. Department of Education, the U.S. Census, the Brookings Institute and its parents and student surveys pulls your data from a long list of. Each school, district or college also has reviews from parents, students and teachers. While I am On this, I decided to check out a school that is likely to end up on my son's short list of colleges in the future. It's as for academics, diversity, professors, value, location, student life and party scene. It is good to know. Meet the smartest parents on earth! Join our parenting Facebook group. When students apply for private school, this is often accompanied by the ultimate goal of getting into a top college. But how exactly does private school prepare you for college? The Association of Boarding Schools (TAB) researched just how willing students were for college. When asked, students who attended both boarding schools and privates reported that they were more college-ready than both academic and non-academic fields in which public school attended. Private school students were also likely to earn an advanced degree, with boarding school students coming in with the highest percentage of advanced degrees earned. Why is that? One reason is that private schools are designed to help students develop a love of learning, meaning they are more likely to continue their schooling beyond high school and graduate college. It's not uncommon to hear a private school graduate coming back from his first year in college saying it was easier than high school. Private schools are harsh, and demand plenty of students. As a result of these high expectations, students have to develop strong work ethics and time management skills. Private schools often require that students participate in two or three sports and afterschool activities, while also offering clubs and activities, in addition to their academics. This heavy schedule means time management skills and a schooling/life balance skill that students are mastered before college. Students who attend boarding school receive an even better preview of college life, more so one day than students at school. why? Because boarding school students live in dorms on campus, rather than at home with their families, they learn what it's like to live independently, but in a more supportive environment than you can find in college. Boarding dorm parents at boarding school play an active role in boarding students' lives, providing guidance and encouraging freedom as they learn to live on their own. From laundry and room cleaning to waking up on time and balancing work and social life, boarding school challenges students to make responsible decisions. Private schools typically offer more diversity than public schools, as these institutions enroll students not just from a city. Boarding schools go even further, welcoming students from around the world. Like colleges, diverse environments offer rich experience, as students live and learn with people from all walks of life. These diverse perspectives on current events, lifestyle, and even pop culture references to the academic classroom Can increase and broaden the personal understanding of the world. Tab study also shows boarding boarding Students are more likely to report having higher-quality teachers than private or public schools. Teachers at boarding school are so much more than just classroom teachers. They are often coaches, dorm parents, consultants, and support systems. It is common for boarding school students to be in touch with their teachers for a long time after graduation. Private school teachers generally don't just have teaching certificates, in fact, many private schools value the experience on a teaching certificate. Private school teachers tend to have advanced degrees in their subject areas, and often have extensive professional backgrounds in their teaching disciplines. Imagine learning physics from a real engineer, or being trained by a former professional player? Private schools strive to pay the best rent in business, and students benefit greatly. Most private schools claim smaller class sizes. In private schools, an average classroom size is often between 12 and 15 students, while NCES reports that an average class grade is from about 17-26 students depending on the level and type of class. These small class sizes, who sometimes have more than one teacher, especially in kindergarten programs and elementary school programs, mean more personal attention for students, no back row, and no chance of being overlooked in the discussion. Private school teachers are also expected to be available outside normal class time for additional help, especially in boarding schools. This supportive environment means that students get even more opportunities for success. Another benefit of boarding school, especially when it comes to preparing for college, is to aid students, and their parents, in the college application process. College consulting offices work with students and their families to help find the best fit colleges and universities. As a junior, and sometimes even as a freshman or sophomore, students start working with qualified college counselors who help guide them through the college application process. From providing help with researching colleges and universities to reviewing financial support and scholarships, college counselors work to help students find schools that will help them thrive. With more than 5,000 colleges and universities in the United States, college counseling services can be invaluable to students and their families. Assisting in finding the right college doesn't just mean finding a school that offers a particular major, either. Private schools also help students capitalize on their strengths during the college admissions process. College counselors can help students identify schools with targeted sports or arts programs, which can be helpful if scholarships are available. For example, a student who hopes to eventually pursue an MBA can opt for a college with a strong business school. But, that same Can also be an exceptional football player, and therefore finding a college with both a strong business program and an active football Can get a lot of help. Boarding school coaches are often involved in helping student athletes get noticed by top college employers, who could result in an athletic scholarship to be played on an athletic team. College is expensive, and every bit of financial aid support can be a big help in staving off mounds of student debt. Loan.
